But now she was stuck at the hospital. How would she get home? The hospital was located in a larger city about 45 minutes away from where she lived. Now she had no way home, and her nearest family lived hours away. She not only was struggling with the loss of her unborn child, but after being discharged at 7:00 A.M., had nowhere to go and no one close to call. In the late afternoon, the chaplain called her cell phone to check on her, knowing it had been a traumatic night. As the chaplain talked to the young woman, he realized she had never gotten home from the hospital. She was waiting for a relative from a nearby state to come pick her up after he got off of work! The chaplain told the young woman he would be happy to come pick her up and drive her home, and immediately left for the hospital with his wife. On their way, they called church friends who agreed to prepare a fresh, hot meal for the young woman. With her permission, they all met at her modest apartment. Together, they thanked the Lord for His provision and asked for His continued help. Contact information was exchanged, so that the church family could assist her further. It was a practical demonstration of the love of God impacting the life of a hurting soul.
